

This volume is a far reaching analysis of the controversy over community control of public services in the nations urban ghettos. It is clearly one of the most rigorous and comprehensive treatments of the subject yet to appear. After reviewing the main arguments for and against community control - and the available evidence in support of each - Mr. Altshuler examines the historic background of the community control movement. He considers the main interests that have ranged themselves in opposition to community control - focusing on the reasons for their fear, the bases of their political influence, and the circumstances, if any, in which they might relax their opposition. The author reviews the most plausible suggestions that have been made about how community control might be implemented. Topics considered include the definition of neighborhoods, mechanisms of political representation, finance, personnel, contracting and the potential federal role.
