

May 2007. The eyes of the world are on Iraq and news broadcasts awash with stories of suicide bombers and Islamic terrorist plots at home and abroad. Yet when devout atheist Lisa Collins shares a bench in a London park with Salman, an Asian widower in his fifties, and her best friend, the man-eating Scarlett, asks her to give English lessons to Muslim ladies at the local women's centre, she is disturbed to discover how little she knows about Islam and its adherents. What do they believe? How do they worship? And how does it feel to be a Muslim in post-9/11 and post-7/7 Britain? Uncomfortable, she imagines. As they chat Lisa has a sneaking suspicion that she's seen Salman before. But where? No matter. By the time they share her sandwiches some time later, the pair have taken the first step in what will become a warm and enriching, but ultimately doomed friendship. For Salman has a secret. Little England sees Lisa flee London for a small village in the West Country. Here, along with the wacky Lily Silverthorne (who suffers from an overdeveloped sensitivity gene) and the local vet (who develops a soft spot for Lisa), she becomes embroiled in an acrimonious conflict sparked by the purchase of the village shop by an Asian family. There is a provocative St George's Day pub quiz, a nocturnal assault on the shop by armed raiders and an explosive public debate on immigration. But what of Lisa? Will there be a super-duper happy ending with bells and bunting for her?
